Cycle of Violence

The Cycle of Abuse will continue until there is an effective intervention or the victim leaves that does not expose her or him to stalking, harassment, and/or retaliation.

1. Honeymoon Phase

As the title suggests this is a time of harmony for a couple. They're loving and happy. It's the phase where the abuser is at their best and, if there has been conflict that did not end the relationship, it's the phase couples return to. In this phase, the victim forgives the abuser and the abuser apologizes or makes excuses for their behavior. The victim may feel like nothing will ever happen again. The abuser also might promise to change, get counseling, stop drinking, etc.

2. Tension Building Phase

Little things seem to annoy the abuser. The abuser is grumpy, critical and demanding. The abuser puts the victim on edge. The victim tries to defuse the abuser's anger, but everything the victim does only seems to make the abuser angrier. In this phase, the abuser may use words to demean the victim, question the victim's every move, and threaten to harm the victim. The constant tension becomes unbearable for the victim.

CYCLE OF ABUSE

Honeymoon Phase: The abuser is at their best, and the victim feels loved and happy. Tension Building Phase: Little things annoy the abuser, who becomes grumpy, critical, and demanding. The victim tries to defuse the abuser's anger, but it only makes the abuser angrier. The constant tension becomes unbearable for the victim.
